He was sent to prison for bank robbery in 1918 when she was a baby. Her mother struggled to raise her and her older brother by herself, but the family was financially strapped. Dorothy got a job as a maid, and then worked as a fruit picker and a seamstress. She lived with her mother in Greenwich Village. In 1921, during the depths of the Great Depression, a program sponsored by the Federal Art Project gave her, among others, a job on the mural, done by the legendary Georgia O'Keeffe. It was the first painting she had done in years, and it inspired her to start painting again. "I suddenly saw my whole world, all the many frustrations, frustrations with life... suddenly I started to think about a number of things that I could do with this mural, and also with my painting," she said. "I realized I needed to paint again." After her father's release from prison, he

Please try again later. postgresql docker and psql -c versions were lower than the latest versions from docker and postgres, respectively. That would only happen if you had created your databases after the postgres was running with a lower version of postgresql-client than what was installed with docker. So no, if you had this problem you had to use the other database client. If you restart docker, and use postgresql-client after you start postgres, the client will revert to the version of the "base image" that you used for the container. You didn't say what you set up that container to use. So I can't advise whether the "base image" you're using is correct. After restarting docker isnt working.

ERROR: The database server was not running when the command was initiated. make: *** [install-service-server] Error 1 Start that container again, using only the version of postgresql-client you wish to install, and it should be fine. I think I can solve the docker error you're getting. I'll try to answer at the same time:

ERROR: The database server was not running when the command was initiated. The original container has a previous version of postgresql-client installed. You have two options. You can either remove the previous version of postgresql-client, or you can specify a database client for your containers. It is possible to use postgresql-client on the host. In my case I have an CentOS server and a docker container. To do that: Remove the previous version of postgresql-client (In my case i had 9.6.1 installed and postgresql-client 9.5.4). To do that: On the host machine, remove the executables for the previous version of postgresql-
