What's New In Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.5.1)?

Roughin' It, Committing To Hike A Trail Enlarge this image toggle caption Kelsy Morgan/NPR Kelsy Morgan/NPR At the end of a long, cold winter, I hit the road with some hikers at the end of January. We trudged through snow drifts and left footprints in the grass of the Blue Ridge Parkway. We had just hiked in from Vienna, Va., bound for Shenandoah National Park, and we walked miles along the parkway to get to the bottom of the mountains. At the summit, I felt like a bronze statue in the sun, proud to share the road with these hikers. (It is important to note that hiking is my primary recreational activity and a source of exercise for me. I am not an avid trail runner.) I watched how the hikers, mostly college students, powered through at an average of 3 mph. They were full of good cheer, having completed a challenging but exhilarating day of hiking. After spending almost 3 hours hiking, I took a picture of myself among the mountains and memories. That's a good feeling, to feel proud to share a place with your fellow neighbors. But I was more proud to know that I was doing my part to get my fellow Virginiaans outside. Why hiking? I enjoy the outdoors. I am happiest when away from all of the things that can kill or distract a person: loud noises, chaos and busy places. These days, I hike on trails. It's time consuming and sometimes it's challenging. Sometimes it is just me and my thoughts and others. Sometimes there are fellow hikers to talk to, but then sometimes the hiking can be solitary. I find that if I hike, I am more present to my surroundings, less dazed and distracted by the outside world. I haven't hiked on the Blue Ridge Parkway in a while because I have almost always come from there on the Appalachian Trail. But I want to do some trail time soon. I haven't signed up for a specific date, but I have a rough idea. I've watched pictures of hikers who have fallen to their deaths on the Appalachian Trail. I don't understand the risk they're taking on a trail of uneven terrain. I hope that I do better. I worry about slips and falls on trails. I know that it is common for hikers to get wet when hiking in the rain, so I'd hate to get overly concerned about not
