Creating engaging newsletters with your curated content is really easy. There are many different varieties of human breast cancers. However, each of these cancers share, at least in part, one common characteristic, the ability to metastasize. Metastasis is the process by which cancer cells leave the primary tumor, enter the bloodstream or lymphatic vessels and travel to distant sites where these cells proliferate forming additional tumors (metastases). Metastasis can be classified as either local or distant metastasis. Local metastasis occurs when tumor cells leave the primary tumor, spread via the bloodstream or lymphatic vessels to nearby sites, and continue to proliferate.

Distant metastasis occurs when tumor cells leave the primary tumor and enter the bloodstream or lymphatic system. Some of the circulating tumor cells stick to other organs in the body, where they continue to proliferate. Other cells enter the bloodstream or lymphatic system and move to distant sites where these cells grow into additional tumors, a process known as metastasis. Distant metastasis is the major cause of death for human cancer patients. As a result of its fatal nature, metastasis has been the subject of many studies. However, despite the many studies, the specific factors responsible for metastatic ability remain elusive. One reason for this is that it is extremely difficult to develop animal models that develop metastasis. There are several models available to study metastasis, but few of them have been shown to develop metastasis. For example, there are several animal models that have been used to study mammary tumor metastasis. The overall purpose of these models is to look for the factors that are required for tumor cells to exit the primary tumor, invade into the surrounding tissues and enter the blood circulation. These models are based on the use of syngeneic strains of mice or rats, inoculated with human breast cancer cells.
