The two most commonly cited limitations of chemoprevention by use of difluoromethylornithine (DFMO) and phenytoin are drug toxicity and poor response rates. We have shown that the former can be obviated by use of DFMO in combination with the beta-glucuronidase-inhibitor methylglyoxal bis-guanylhydrazone (MGBG). Tumor recurrences are now occurring only in the initially-unsensitized patients and drugs that can bind selectively to this population should provide a more effective means to treat patients. To determine whether MGBG in combination with DFMO can obviate the toxicity to which other agents such as hydroxyurea have been linked, we administered DFMO (2.5g/m<sup>2</sup>/day orally) and/or MGBG (40 mg twice weekly) alone or in combination to rats. Friday, September 02, 2009 I've had this conversation with my mother quite often (it's something we enjoy sharing together, both our history, heartburn, etc.) and I'd like to talk a bit about it here. She has some interesting opinions about my husband and I. Like me, he has diabetes. As a child, he had kidney damage from diabetes--so his blood sugar is not always under control. Some of the Diabetes Association's recommendations are rather scary: He also has high cholesterol, another thing that we can't completely control. They recommend that he take medicine, statins, etc., something that would make many people feel a bit guilty about not wanting to eat cake. All of these healthy things, and he and I have great food. He skips some junk, she cooks good food for him. I get stress-belly aches if he skips breakfast. The stress-belly aches are probably a sign that his insulin is too low. Admittedly, he's heavier than when he was diagnosed. At his original diagnosis, he was 100 pounds, a textbook diabetic, and his blood sugar was 12 points under normal. Now, his blood sugar (tested frequently) is 7 points higher than normal. When I look at his waistline, it's 3 inches smaller than it was at diagnosis. It's a little larger than his daughter (by 4). I'm more likely to notice a small change in him. These days, when he gets his blood sugar checked, the nurse or technician calls me to report. Before, he would sneak in his blood sugar (and once, in front of her boss, the paramedic who delivers his insulin) without telling me. We always laughed at his timing! Besides these two
